LONDON, Oct. 14 — A British businessman who was smuggled out before his death in 1963. The papers were run "The Penkovsky Papers," edited by Frank Gibney, is a series beginning Oct. 31.]

Greville Wynne, who served more than a year in prison in the U.S.S.R., said the bunker was built with the help of hundreds of parcels of a cement-hardening mixture brought into the country from the U.S.S.R. by Soviet citizens. Wynne spoke at a news conference in connection with the publication next month of a book called "The Penkovsky Papers."

They comprise notes, sketches and comments made in 1961 and 1962 by Oleg Penkovsky, Russian scientific and military intelligence officer executed in the Soviet Union for spying in 1963. The affair caused a wholesale shakeup in the Soviet security apparatus. [The Washington Post will run "The Penkovsky Papers," edited by Frank Gibney, is a series beginning Oct. 31.]

Yynne said that in the section of papers being published Penkovsky pictured corruption and extravagant living by the Russian elite, with wild parties and orgies. Wynne spoke of Penkovsky as "an associate and later a firm friend. He said the Russian wanted not merely to give intelligence information but also to let the West know about his motives.

Also in the papers is a "Soviet spy's guidebook to the U.S.A.," said to be a top-secret Soviet intelligence lecture on spying in New York and Washington.
